Translation Notes

Page 31 – Three-way meeting
A meeting between a student, one of their parents, and their teacher.

Page 46 – Scantron quiz
A scantron quiz is one with a multiple choice answer sheet that is machine readable and can be computer graded by running it through a special scanner.

Page 65 – Visual *kei
Visual kei is a Japanese music subculture with a prominent visual component. The music can range from hard rock to playful pop, but the style is usually characterized by colorful, elaborate costumes and hair design, extensive makeup, and a generally androgynous look.

Page 71 – The porch of Kiyomizu
The main hall of the Buddhist temple of Kiyomizu in Kyoto has a wide veranda to accommodate the numerous pilgrims who visit. Hanging over a steep cliffside, this veranda, or porch, is approximately thirteen meters off of the ground. During the Edo period, there was a superstition that anyone who entrusted their life to the goddess Kannon and jumped off would not only survive, but also have their wish granted. About 85 percent of the 234 jumpers recorded during that period did in fact survive, possibly because there were thick trees below the veranda at the time. Jumping was made illegal in 1872, but Shuu is implying that Tooru should jump, since they're at the actual place. These days, to "jump off the porch at Kiyomizu" is a Japanese expression similar to "take the plunge."

Japanese school rules are quite strict, and personal items like jewelry and accessories are often forbidden.
